House dust mite, D. pteronyssinus, is a major cause of allergy. The allergenicity is mostly associated with endotoxin activity. However, endotoxin is a complex polysaccharide and difficult to isolate by standard methods. Previous investigations on D. pteronyssinus allergens used extracts of whole mite as allergen sources. In the present study, allergens were purified by ammonium sulfate precipitation and DEAE-Sepharose chromatographic and chromatofocusing techniques. Purified allergens included the following: a 60 kDa basic protein and a heterogeneous protein (32 kDa), a 120 kDa acidic protein and a 62 kDa acidic protein, and a basic 52 kDa protein and a 14 kDa protein. The 60 kDa protein was identified as the group 1 allergen (Der p 1) previously. The 32 kDa protein was a minor allergen in the extract. The fractions containing major allergens were all obtained by
